

when certain people want to pontificate and posture and make it seem that they have so much respect for the law and the appropriateness of things being done. And then with their other hand, they are plundering the treasury. They are not redistributing wealth through some of these tax proposals, they are redistributing misery. Those who are not in misery will have it better. They are to be oiled. They are to be greased. They are to be massaged. They are to be placed in great and utter comfort. What Senator McFarland is doing is saying stay with the system that the public is familiar with, one that is not difficult, one that does not contain within its confines the allowance of all of the things that 773 opens up. Revenue codes are some of the most complex and extensive laws that you will find in any country that has them because they are histories and records of favoritism and privilege. That is why the Internal Revenue Code is so complex and so thick and has to be rewritten so often. There was a time when more honesty would show its face on the floor of this Legislature because there was not such a small apparent pot that people had to scramble around to try to draw from to take care of their special interests, but now that what is in that pot has been shrunk or perceived to have been shrunk, we now see a change, a change. The chameleons are with us and among us and they must be pointed out. But what good will it do? None. We are going to hear all kind of moral fervor and indignation when we talk about five miles per hour on the speed limit, but something like this...

SPEAKER BARRETT: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...is touched very delicately. It is only teased in the same way that somebody having a toothache might take a piece of thread or floss and just kind of gently tease at that pain because there is something kind of pleasurable about it even though there is a bit of pain, but nobody is going to without anesthesia jerk that tooth out. So, Senator Johnson and others are allowing persons such as Senator McFarland and myself to tease the diseased tooth but we will not be allowed to extract it. Senator Johnson and others will not extract it. They will be like the dentist who I would say is guilty of malpractice who will put a lot of novocaine into your jaw and the blood runs down, but you don't feel the pain so you think nothing bad is happening to you. You think that the disease that was there is cured because you don't feel it, but your condition has been made worse, and that is what 773 is, a case of legislative malpractice, and...
